

dropped out of the race for one reason or another. The pace and strategy of the race will change now, once the mushers have this lay over and mentally prepare themselves for the last 1/2 of the Quest.

Alice's brother sent this for those who are interested <http://www.yukonquest.org> (Joyce)

Journal no 13

We caught some of the action and Joyce watched 2 mushers leave Dawson midday and together teams to trickle in. A few more mushers have support crews are now waiting for the rest of the team through the crowd. The media and camping area. I did manage to catch a quick pic at the checkpoint, they were already leaving for the waterfront but by the time I reached the distance and started to run towards the was about 20 minutes from town so I got dressed and headed out the door. I saw them from a radio broadcaster saying the first musher heard a radio in Dawson. I

Journal No 12

Dawson City Journals, Jan/Feb 2005: Part 2

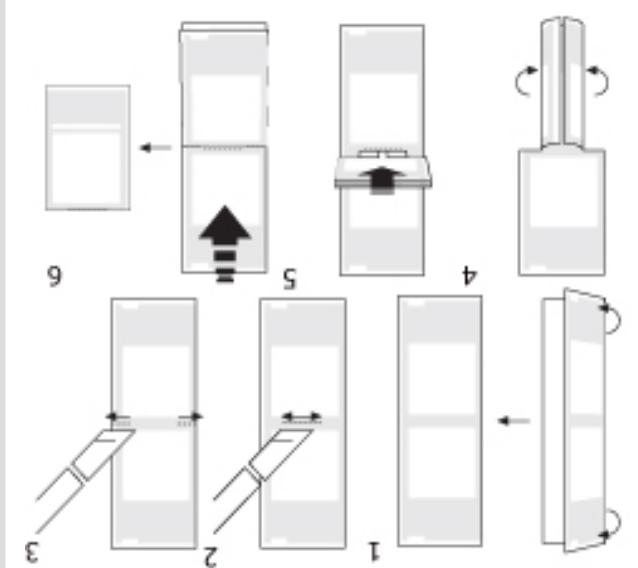

Alice Angus and Joyce Majiski

DIFFUSION GENERATOR

centrally in this range is Tombstone Mountain, a see the southern Ogilvie Mountain Range. Located ridge-tops and beyond. To the far north you can the summer months, winding its way across the Highway which connects Canada and the USA in the west you can see the Top of the World in a panorama that stretches off in all directions. To From the summit of the Dome the world unfolds circle the horizon without touching it. Solstice celebration where one can watch the sun through knee deep snow in spots until I could see the open slope of the Dome summit above. The surreal below. I continued up the trail, fighting diamonds and Dawson City seemed small and located. The sun made the snow sparkle like communication towers and satellite dishes are through the forest into an open section where the first time. I followed the steep Nature Trail up 30 below zero I walked up the Midnight Dome for soft looking slopes. When the temperature rose to romantic wonderland of heavily draped trees and winter. It has turned the landscape into a

The Yukon has had near record snowfalls this available to download, print out and share.

DIFFUSION books are designed to be freely
www.diffusion.org.uk

created on: Mon May 14 05:35:42 2007

Dawson City Journals, Jan/Feb 2005: Part 2
Alice Angus and Joyce Majiski

stunning batholith of jagged peaks thrust up like a pyramid through a high alpine meadow.

Walking around to see the southern view, I look down into the Klondike River valley. This is the clearest evidence of mining in the area, even in the winter. Surrounding slopes have been denuded in spots, but worst is the trail of tailings left behind by the big dredge. This machine churned up the entire bed of the Klondike River in the search for gold, leaving a worm trail of stone tailings behind as its legacy. The tailings now form the foundations for several residential homes and businesses and greet everyone who drives to Dawson with the tales of the search for gold and the rubble left behind.

The Klondike River drains into the Yukon River at Dawson City. In addition to the relatively small Klondike, the Yukon has already been fed by many larger and glacially fed rivers, such as the Slims, Kluane and White Rivers. By the time the Yukon passes through Dawson it is a wide and strong river, yet it has another 1000 miles or so to travel before it drains into the Bering Sea. From the Dome I can see sections of open water in the river, both upstream and downstream of air and food gathering. I realised that I had been had come out of their nests for a breath of fresh criss-crossed with tracks as if all of the animals in the b almy -10 temperature. The snow was behind Dawson City) for another burst of exercise yesterday I blasted up the Midnight Dome (hill h乖乖ed near 50 below for almost a week already.

Journal No 6

(Joyce)
wonder if they will ever freeze, since it has Dawson, creating slow furls of fog in the cold. I path and sled the stuff that could freeze up to the cab in. The rest will happen tomorrow, but I am fairly pooped for now. Unfortunately I don't have that nifty digital camera to take a shot to send you all. But if you close your eyes and imagine a classic little log house with a peaked roof, with a blue door and all covered in 2 feet of snow- that would be what it looked like. That is all from the snowy depths of Joyce's abode, about 20 minutes drive from Whitehorse, Yukon. Bye for now. (Joyce).

focused on how human activity is affected by the weather. This was apparent by the lack of vehicles and human movement at 50 below and the ice fog which lends such an eerie uninhabited feeling to the place.

During my walks in the bush, in the extreme cold, I revelled in the quiet, the snow on trees and the peace of the place, forgetting the implications that this cold has on wildlife. Seeing the tiny tracks of lemmings, voles, mice and shrews was a real treat, and reminded me to think beyond the human scope of experience. Seen here is an arctic hare track. (Joyce)

When I got home and it took me a while to dig a bear sighting I have encountered on any drive. roadside. That was probably the most intensive dandelion flowers which had erupted along the road from Whitehorse, I counted 13 black bears in less than an hour. Most of them were munching from Whitehorse, about 8 hours home from there. That was a 3 day drive, and on Feb /March, I flew back to Calgary and drove enough time to dig out the camera during these occasions. After last years visit to the UK in walking on its huge snowshoe feet. There is never walked into the trees on the snow surface, a lynx- thickly furred and beautiful, it calmly was a small bear and as I slowed I realised it was would have been summer I would have thought it shape across the road and head for the trees. If it trees. Further along I saw a fairly large dark charged off into the belly deep snow and into the salt I imagine. They scambled to their feet and their knees in the middle of the road, licking the cow and calf moose at one point. They were on crossing, roughly half way. I slowed down for a hard packed ice/snow until I reached Pelly Dawson. The roads were pretty glare with slick toe cocktail".more on that next time. (Joyce) Dawson. Even more so than drinking the "Sour of those quintessential experiences of visiting I must endeavour to drag Alice inside as it is one crowd and the great bands it attracts. Hotel is infamous in the north for the colourful known as The Pit, the pink and white Westminister friendly, on the road to somewhere. Locally down the middle of the street, glassy eyed but (the local watering hole) who truly was weaving yesterday I encountered someone leaving the Pit indulged in a few too many libations.

one another as they lurch down the street, having and reminded me of 2 old men leaning heavily on buildings are situated across from the liquor store through Dawson I always linger near the oldest structures on the street. These 2 old drunken ends a softness to the place. While wandering A new dusting of snow started last night and indulged in a few too many libations.

19 20

Journal 16

This is my last morning in Dawson. The weather is warm and there was a dusting of snow yesterday which has covered my newly cleaned car, once again. The sky looks heavy with the portent of more snow. I am armed with several CD's to sing my way home and a bag of snacks for diversion during the 7 hour drive.

Later... I made it home in one piece, the drive was stunningly beautiful with clear blue skies for much of the time. It seems I left the cloud in buried in the snow but I had been there on a previous visit. (Joyce)

Today's journal features - water fill up and gas for less

'real' place at last. One phase of this took Joyce and I to, Ardnamurchan, the Caringorms, the Spey Valley and the Highlands (all in Scotland) and the film does feature the Loch Ness Monster. Imagine how thrilled we were to find, squished in the bookcase under a huge pile of novels, a copy of a small paper back entitled The Search for the Loch Ness Monster. It informed us that there have been many reliable sightings by reliable witnesses such as military men, doctors and lawyers (no women I note). So there it was, a blue and green depiction of the monster rising from the murky waters of Loch Ness, half way around the world and 200 k south of the arctic; our journey seemed to have come full circle. (Alice)

Journal 15

Close to the city of Dawson are a number of old cemeteries from the gold rush. One has a prominent marker signifying the Yukon Order of Pioneers, further along there is an NWMP North West Mounted Police (now called Royal Canadian MP) grave site. The markers are wood slab s, greying with age, telling of sickness and too often an early demise. Up on the Dome road there is another cemetery which has a Jewish section. It is the Yukon and North Western Canada - to see the handful of journeys, between London, Scotland, misapprehensions we b etween finally a was like, laugher at the myths and of e-mail, discussions on what each of our homes myself and Rob oscis involving many exchanges culmination of a long collaboration between Joyce project Topographies and Tales - which is the Joyce and I are here to make a film for our taken with it as I was by the Snow Campers. popular show on CBC north. Though I was not a running soap, Coronation Street, which is also a about the women characters in the UK's, longest also surprised to see a hardback edition of a book adventures from the Snow Campers Guide. I was equipped for on the subject of thrilling snow bound equipment and other essential technical gearily photographs depicting types of footwear, rainly illustrated with timeless black and white much from the Snow Campers Guide, which is of its collection of books. I could have learned time to sit in the residence and rifle through some has flown and I am sorry not to have had more Now that we are getting ready to leave, the time

Journal no 14: Reading Material

Journal No 9

Affectionately known as the Pit...the pink palace is the place for general drunkenness and local colour in Dawson- It is the place to go if you want to experience a frontier watering hole. Unfortunately it looks pretty respectable from this angle. With the buzz of the Quest (see journal 8), I am certain it would be the place to be over the next few nights. (Joyce)

Todday Alice and I walked across the Yukon River take a fair amount of space. (Joyce) fourteen dogs, each with a comfortable straw bed edding area for the dogs. When staked out, mountains of snow to prepare a feeding and the humans whose tasks include shoveling away with stovespipes peaking through the roof, house their respective teams. White canvas wall tents to see where the handles are setting up camp for and straw bales on the roof, is exciting. trucks with boxes drive through town, sleds coming through. Just watching the numerous the first of the Yukon Quest dog racers will be activity and the speculation is that by tomorrow the back of winter. Dawson is bustling with 7:30 and somehow it feels as if we have broken This morning there was light on the horizon by the sudden and steady influx of visitors to town. a feeling of merging and busyness preparation for returning home to shovel off their walks. There is southern holidays during the darkest months are off the winter blues and residents who escaped on slowly merge into the light. People are shaking It has been quite interesting to watch Dawson

Journal No 11

There is an arrow fashioned of green duct tape on the kitchen floor of the residency. Alice thought it was either a remnant of an artwork or garbage and ignored it. In fact the arrow points northward and I tend to orient myself each time I enter the kitchen. With the stove on the north wall it seems I am oriented north quite often.

We had another drop in temperature overnight. This morning the thermometer read -30C. This bodes well for the dog teams racing in the Yukon quest, which departed from Whitehorse today. Everyting goes much more smoothly when the weather is colder: the dogs don't overheat, there is less overflow on the ice and cold usually means clear and no snow.

The first teams should reach Dawson in the next 24 hours. The competitors have a mandatory lay over of 36 hours here in Dawson, where the dogs are checked by vets and the mushers get a chance to have a real rest while the handlers look after the dogs. The start and finish locations alternate each year between Fairbanks, Alaska and Whitehorse, Yukon, which are about 1000 miles apart. It is one of the longest and most challenging races in the dog sledding world and there is great excitement as the teams leave town long winter sleep. Businesses are reopening after a winter break and everyone is preparing for the long winter coming through. (Joyce)

Alice, baby Clara and Joyce watched the last ones leave at nightfall. They wished off up the river and smaller against the big broad wilderness. They grew smaller and ride away into distance. They were excited to watch their final destination and it was exciting to watch several more days on the trail before the race under a bright moon and into the night. It will be quite calm, while the second team were quite different. The first team the dogs were quite different. The teams Joyce saw at midday characters of one of his handlers in the sled. (Alice and Joyce) signal that he could leave, which is why he has come down to the checkpoint to wait for the and eager to go. The first shot is of Frank Turner and bark, ready to go, jumping in the traces quite calm, while the second team were quite different. The first team the dogs were quite different. The teams Joyce saw at midday characters of one of his handlers in the sled. (Alice and Joyce) signal that he could leave, which is why he has come down to the checkpoint to wait for the and bark, ready to go, jumping in the traces quite calm, while the second team were quite different. The first team the dogs were quite different. The teams Joyce saw at midday characters of one of his handlers in the sled. (Alice and Joyce) signal that he could leave, which is why he has come down to the checkpoint to wait for the and bark, ready to go, jumping in the traces quite calm, while the second team were quite different. The first team the dogs were quite different. The teams Joyce saw at midday characters of